

the space between my legs was written during the thinking and making of the exhibition made at Villa de Bank in Enschede, 2026.

supported by the European Union under the Culture Moves Europe Individual Mobility Fund.

february-july

sometimes i speak words meaning the opposite, and expect of the other to not understand what i say but what i mean. this putting themselves in my shoes, as if i lied and said i own theirs.

then i leave it. with the responsibility i remove from me to add to them. but my shoes are mine, unless i gift them, an act of resolution (a false act). it is about seeing the shoes, if we speak about the possible. this a photograph can do, and your eyes do. i ask you, do you want to see my shoes? and i show them to you, i take them off my socks and hold them to your eye. you can hold them, and i think you should. but please do not wear them, as yours won't fit mine. there is no more to want than shoes not yours. if wanting is a sin.

but sin is inappropriate, the term. sin is not disadvantage, instead call it 'asking for forgiveness' and i sin because i can not wear your shoes, i force this with a violent act - believing i can. i steal you from you when i tell the lie, i am you. for the concepts are not finite, and not to be defined as you and i. aggressive terms, escapes to inside spaces, not neutral.

i am not i as you are not you. and you frown, but you smell what you smell and i touch what i touch, and i give to you my sweat as you give me your hand, and we join in sin.

i am swallowed with time and reduced to a dot then erased and drawn again, and inflated with my breath. i am big bang as when in a meltdown, my dermis touches my spirit, when i float in the water and feel myself as a drawing. my movement is restricted with this body i treat often precariously, i punish myself for owning it and look for some forgiveness. i am a flagellant. i am more religious than i let on, something to come to terms with. i re-appropriate these concepts as mine. as christian values are just re-appropriated human values. how to appropriate my body as mine, when i know it does not belong to me, as i must walk with it and go to the supermarket to sustain it, and pay the water bill, and sleep under a roof.

time is as gravity, as pressure, something that ties us down if we let it - it is transmutable, physically depictable after its passing. the during of it remains trapped in healing, moving from a to b, sentences, changes of opinion, buildings being built, progress and the backwardness of our times.

but it fools us, i do not believe in time. it has given me enough proof of its elasticity to consider it a fact.

and because of this i attempt to trap it, as i've drifted away from myself again and time doesn't allow me to return.

i have two feet in the future and one in the present. i think of all that has happened and see a beige wall. i feel this wall, it is my forehead. during overwhelming times it solidifies, it is the opaque and unforgiving pantone color of the year. not one to lean on as it leans on me. pressure again. the inner conversation i had laying in bed yesterday. my self portrait is of a box lined with fabric because of the tension i felt while stretching it; the conclusion reached when speaking out loud about it being as gravity is, equally unforgiving.

i sit in this line with predictability. it allows for silence; and a literal reaching of a confirming hand touching me back.

(i try to) not swim against the current.

time is stretched and i feel stretching fingers elongate and u-turn towards themselves. moving forward (in what must be another dimension). i just might enter myself someway so to see what is in the outer, it is still humid but much warmer, i can wear a t-shirt now.

i think i crawl, i do it attentively. when i trace my hand i must keep tense so the pen doesn't change it's position, and keep the legs tense so they won't move by themselves. i feel discomfort, i keep the body warm at night. i don't feel the left side of the tip of the right hand indicating finger. if the pen isn't able to touch my body i close one eye and keep its top part on the edge of the arm or leg, this is some indicator (not to get a taller pen) to give closer of a look. i hold the body with attention. i attentively hold my body. i paint inside the lines, my face sits above my leg.

and i accept i am smaller than i thought, i was not to expect (accept) my two-dimensional self was to feel proportionally smaller than my body. more confusion. and i do this sixteen times.

i move between planes but leave my action always before me. to see the two as three and then four. the four we live in, one forgotten time. i recycle myself between dimensions. overwhelming it is to know there are more, that there are more colors as well, more sensations. and those that can be reached by hovering around the body make inaccessible those righteous to us.

and these objects i make as an impasse, the hesitation belongs to my movement as when i walk and get dispersed, and my form dissipates into the street not to be differentiated from those walking past me.

this second body takes me where i must go, where i agreed to go beforehand but find no energy to; i agreed because motivation lies in the future. my present is dictated by what i must make happen for my first body with the second, in the future; i decide to stand so my legs know their utility, they can ask for movement if they wish. but the second body is a reserve, as an emergency body, this one only has two legs and two arms and one head. everything else stays in the first. who is this body that ate me; the words inside my head are mine but few. the ones left are reminders of what must be done. i wait in the sun.

the tip of my finger is noticed again. it is circular culminating where the flesh meets the nail and it goes down through the inside of the finger. the nail becomes noticed, i know it's shape by feeling it glued to my finger. you sense the body positively twice, this is why people are so negative.

you sense yourself physically

i practice what i can not do. the wall is space. where the colour of the figure meets the colour of its background there is a space that is both and neither.

unease, not feeling some belonging to the ground we stand on, and, as we can not levitate we pretend. ignore contact with the floor, not seeing ourselves reflected (being two is being with your second outline). then i lie when i say i am two, i become multiple.

there is need in needing. to be you so i can touch myself.

in touch through the in. sensing form. giving myself shape.

form holds shape within it, but shape is an incapable being, it is reduced to form. unjust. and we see form only through shape. so it is just, to keep the eyes closed at times, to let your organs feel themselves.

swimming is sensing your form, bathing. engulfed, wrapped, and confirming you with your hands rubbing the skin. as when an animal cleans their back, you lean on a wall.

i am left with the physical sensation of the future. i walk on it, not presently. and my work remains a testament to my opacity, it does not lie as much as i'd like it to.

outlines, my insistence on recognizing them as part of the world. how my vision is grainy if an outline is not clear, then the difference between my hand and the cup it holds is turned into convergence. focus on the palpable lines to see the difference in things, and make them up to confidently stand in one place. staying still allows for time to feel the body in its position, as when i walk it is blurred with the street and the houses and the sky.

i assert my presence by putting a leg between mine.

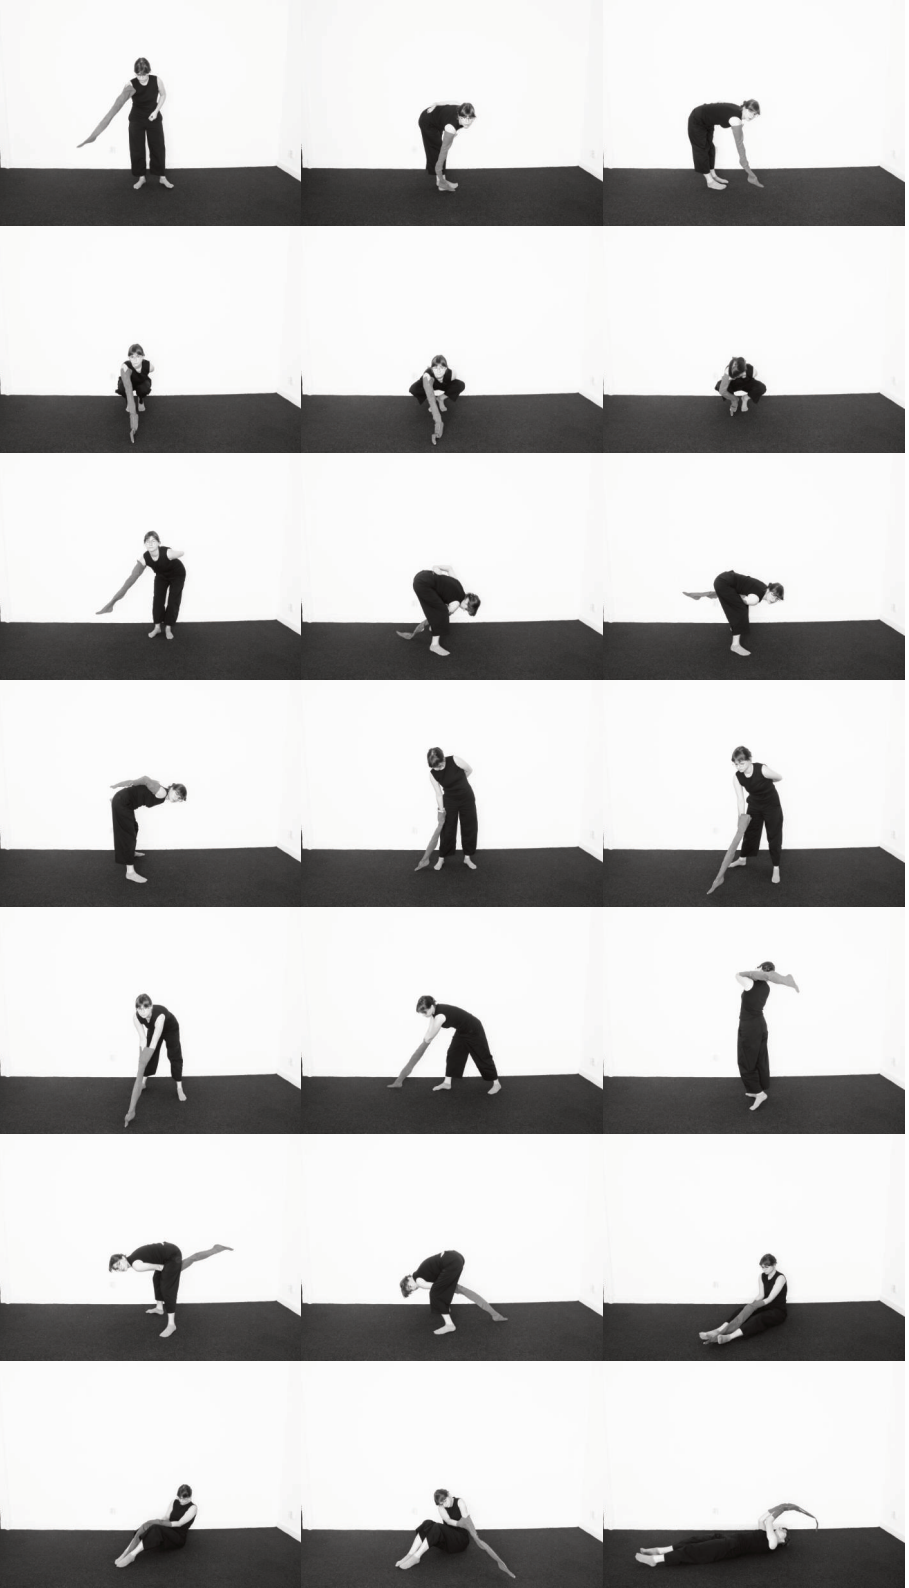

august-september

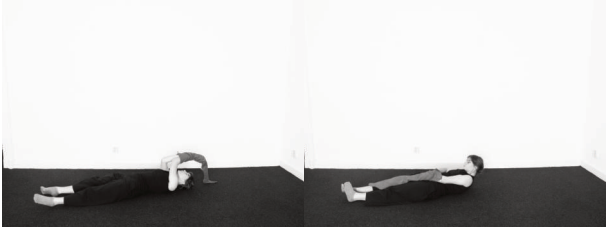

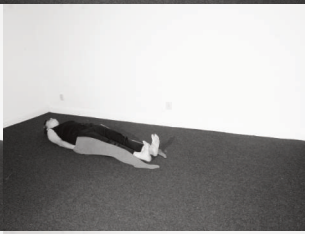

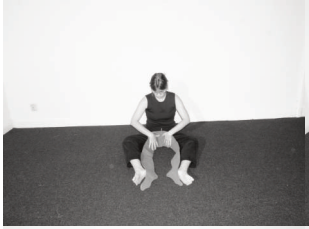

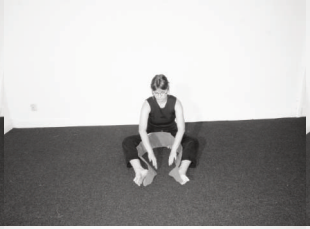

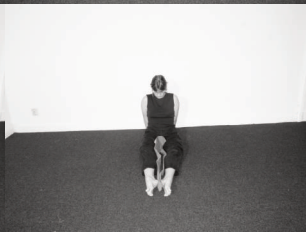

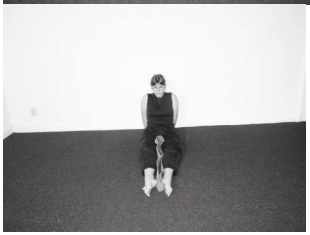

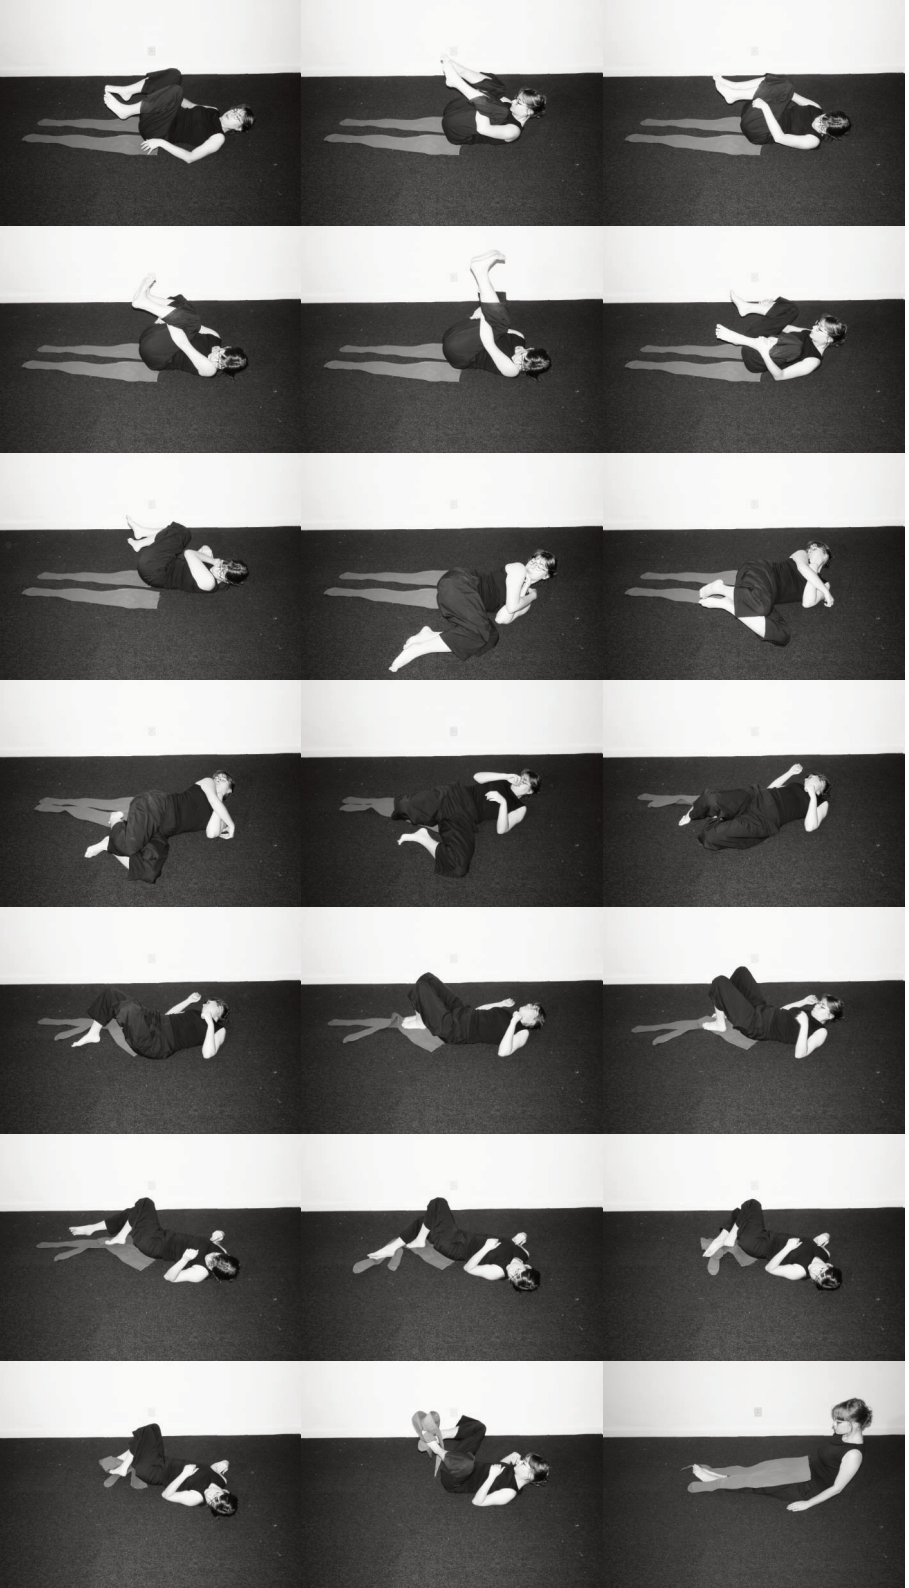

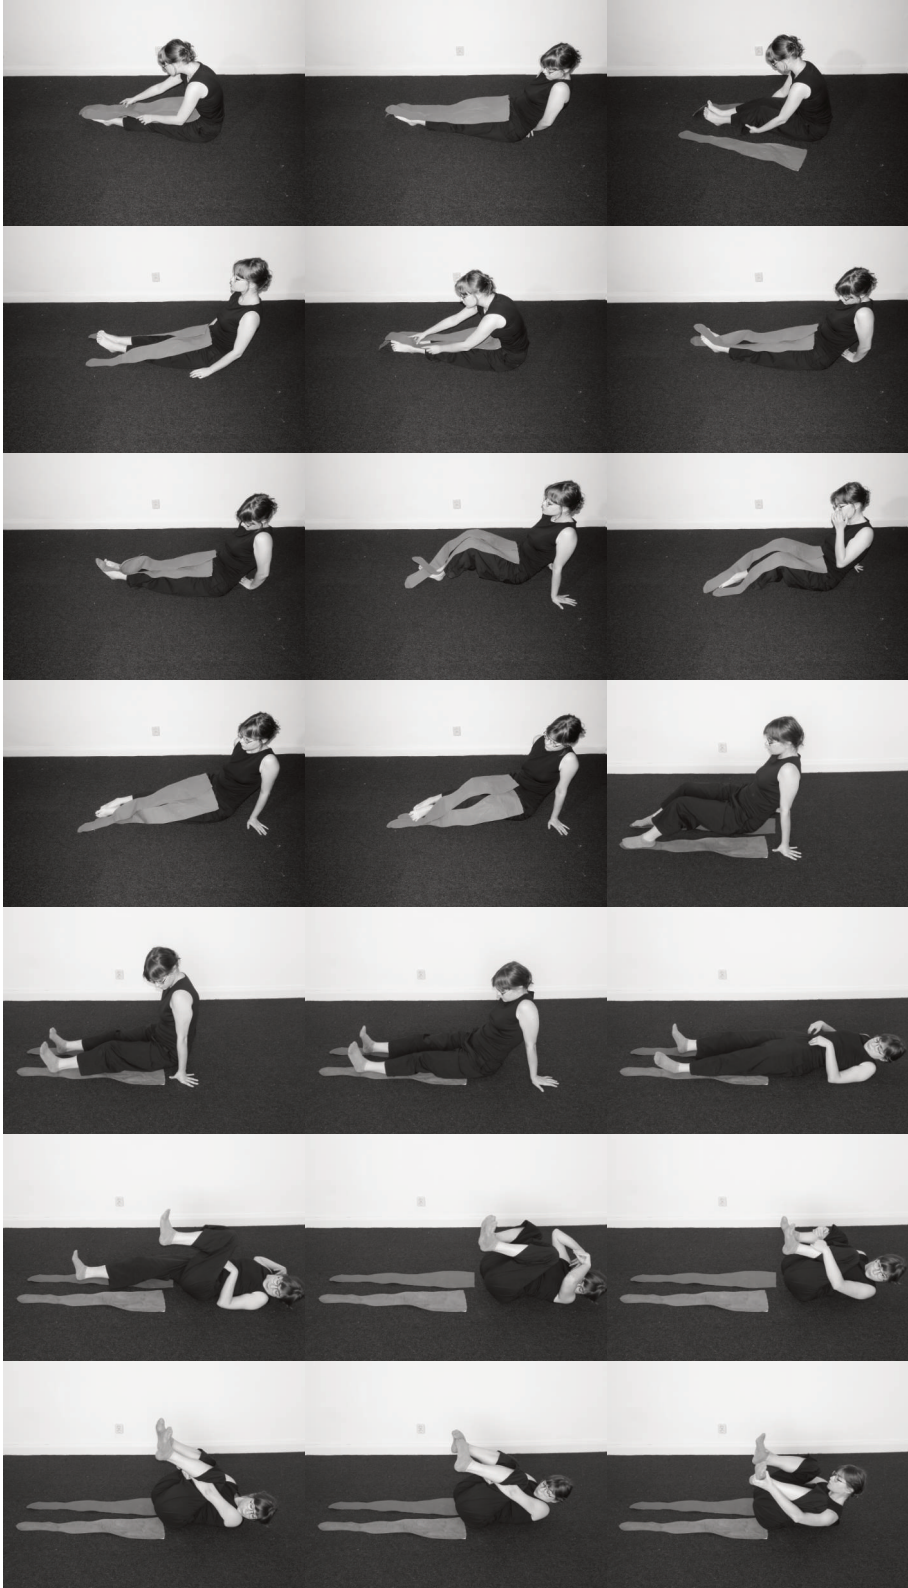

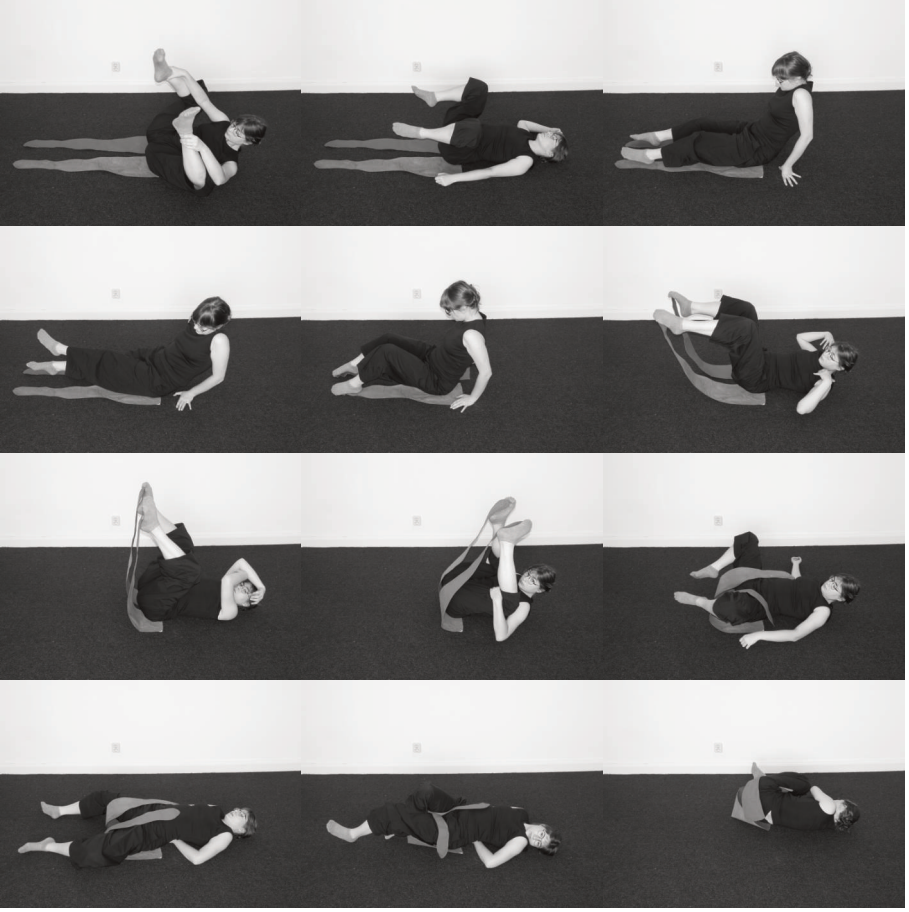

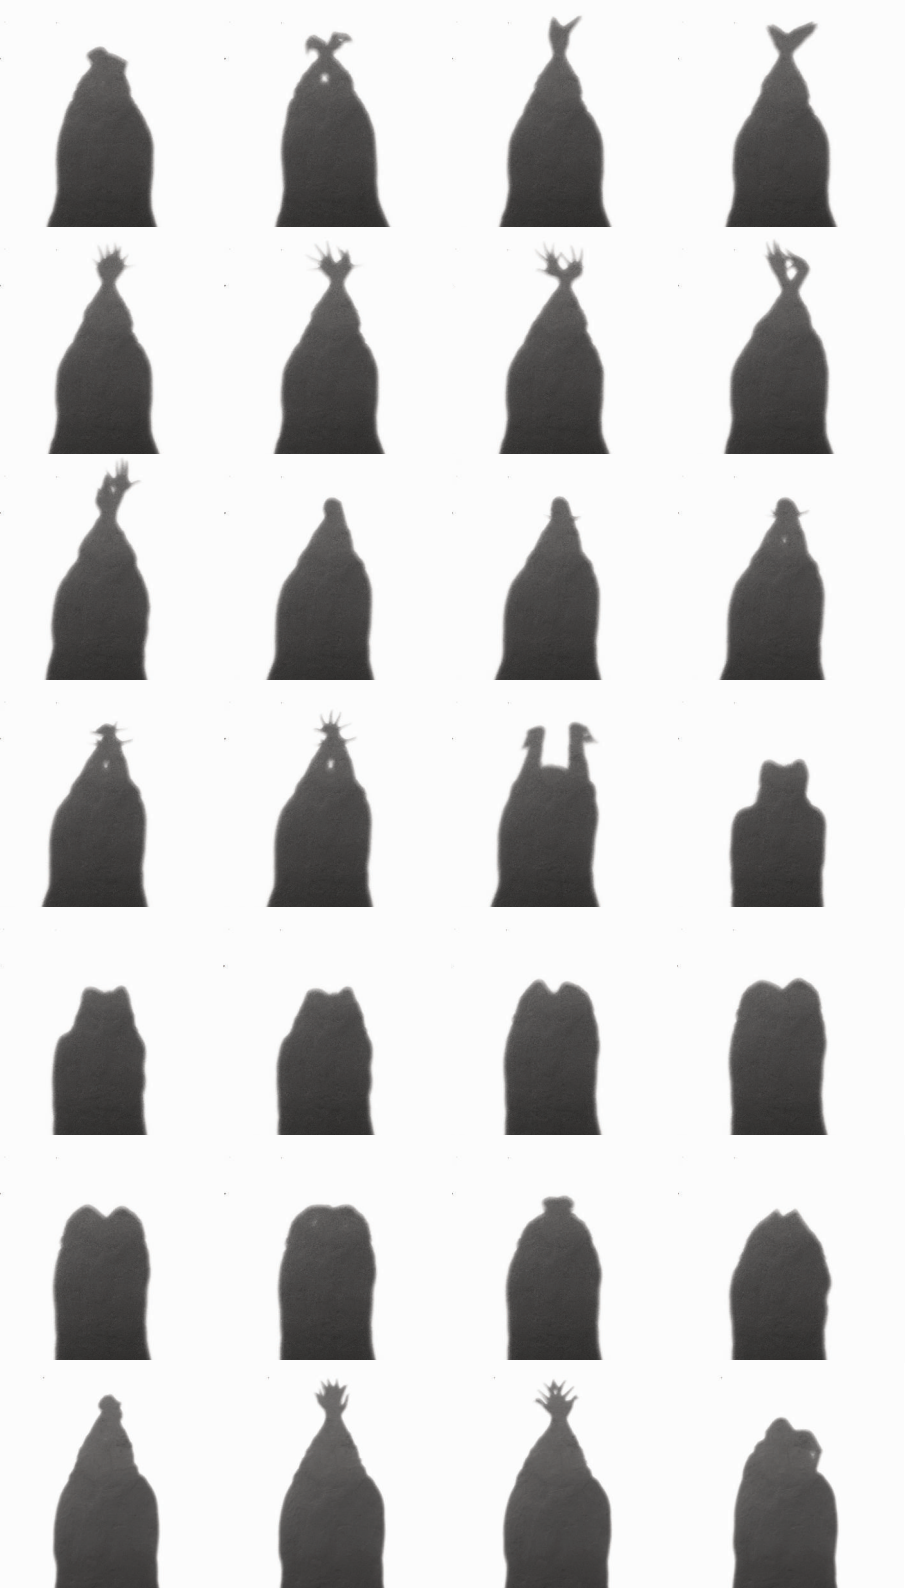

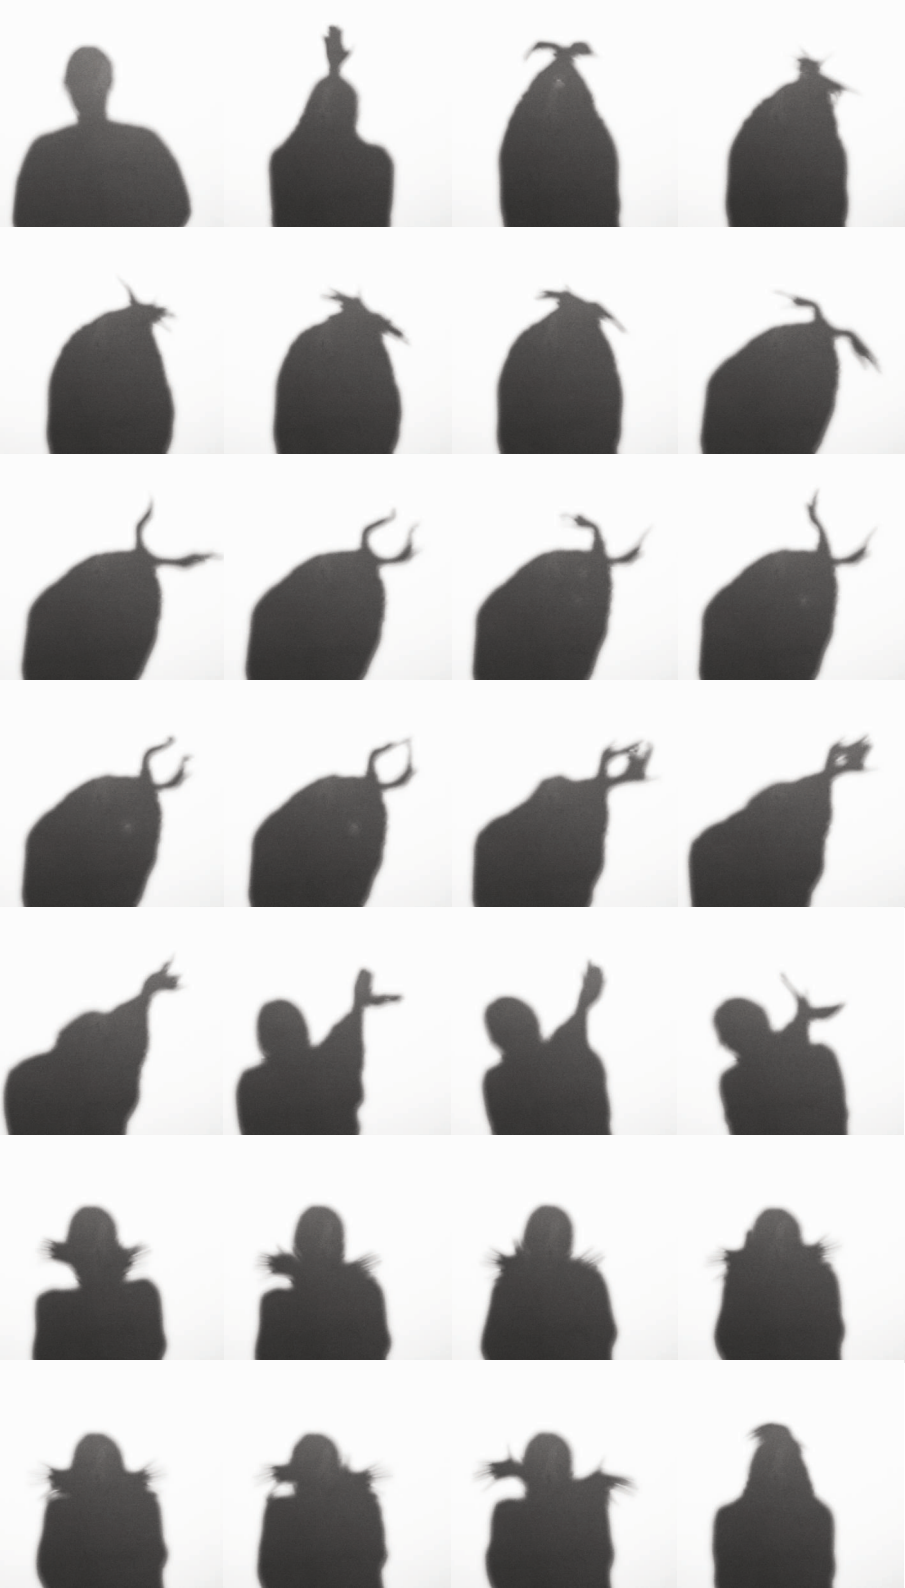

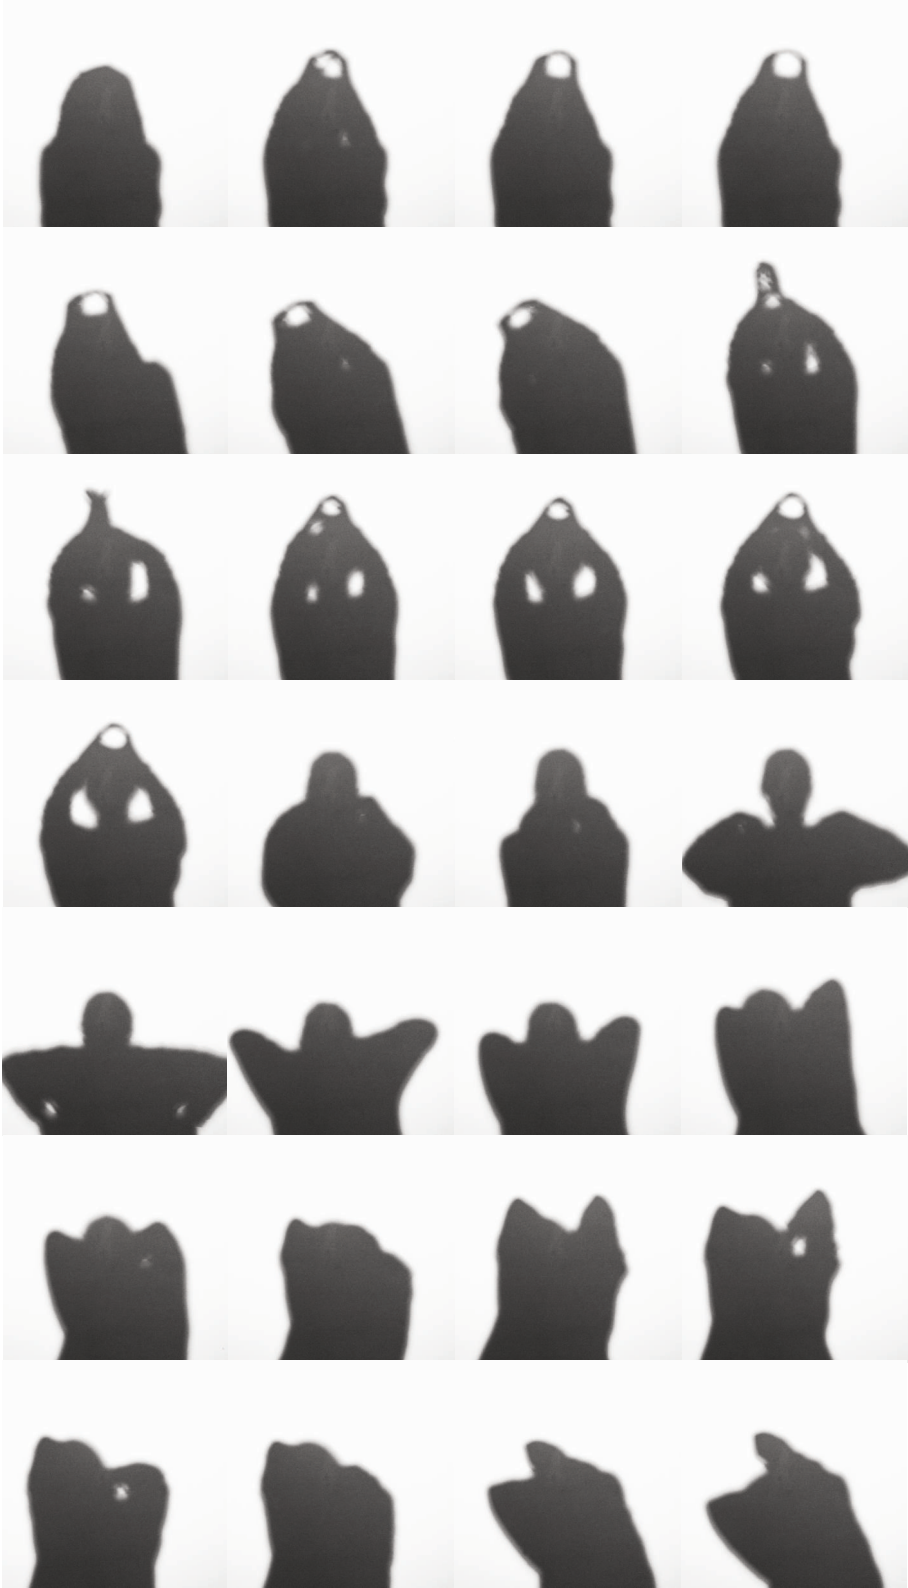

my two arms fit in my legs as a puppet hand inside a sock with its own will to arrive at the one plane where two became one, and then i notice my arms have run away from me.

i breath and swallow my head in my torso, and nuzzle the nose's way inside my left leg then foot.

i give and press, i stand with my feet on my chest. i stand not with, on myself. i stand with myself only when regarding there are two of us. give me one i'll give you two. there is the outline of my two feet on my chest, i notice changing with light. when i look in the mirror it does not mean there are two of us.

i wonder whether my body hurts in its places to let me know it is still there, like when a friend puts their hand on your back walking through a crowd.

now i think, as i have been clenching my jaw, will speaking bring me equal struggles to get somewhere.

practice attention, a bodily thing to do. you focus on the body, through tracing it, there you see gravity, weight, resistance. when you want your leg to stay down, it is not doable. you must change position or! keep your leg still.

close one eye and look at the top of your mark (mark maker, tracer as in trace as in traço) as it outlines the leg. where you close your eye from is up to you. you may variate from ninety to forty degrees (you sit upright or lay as low as you can). you will notice how your body reacts to the position, and how you must contradict it to see it from another perspective.

(to see yourself from outside) the outlines are not true! they are indicators, a representation, signifiers of presence. the expression to see yourself from outside neither implies a physical seeing.

things then click! you are not flat!!!

you are not the flat shape in front of you. the exercise is a practicing of re-embodying, entering my form again by facing it (producing it).

an indicator of volume is conceptually relevant as an indicator of the space we occupy in the world both literally and in idea. the shape of your outline, not your body, is an object of you. you are flattened as your experience is.

when the limb is causing more harm than good, the crab tightens their muscles until it pops off.

i feel it there pressed against my head, heavy, i touch, and it goes to my hands. the finger beds are flat. silence outlines that which we do not hear. i don't hear where the nail grows, it must make some noise. i know the wind is there because the trees tell me, bird sounds are echoed ping pong.

the thought of replicating myself appears as a warning sign. i extend myself.

i am to eat myself, then my body and my mind and my thoughts, so they are digested. so i say and repeat i am not my thoughts. there is a person sitting inside here with me, and i insist on being i. i turned myself inside out, and flattened i to a shape i can see.

i am a football shoe in quicksand.

with fear i’ve forgotten how to walk, to be stable, not so much so i can still move forward. one and then the other. and then the other. surprise, i've grown a third leg. the body always goes first, the avant-garde of the soul. keep in mind, i metaphorize as there is no one and the other as the separating one leg is not to say it is separate from my liver, but i failed this far to find a better way.

a correct way of speaking of my disembodiment, the body is not an extra entity to my being in with, as my thoughts are definitely a separate entity. my thoughts are i, my body is, and you are my sensation lacks ability to see my knee, my legs bend either way, and i bend because i force myself to write this text on a morning where energy is there, but will isn't. so, despite my efforts of running away from will, i seem to focus on it.

when a hair goes in the opposite direction of its partners, by the force of wind or your sleeve, it is seen with sensation. when i was a kid i assumed it was an abnormality like a computer glitch where cells coagulated until eventually they'd return to their place (by force of your scratching or your insistent "if i don't notice it it will go away" thought. things we only say to ourselves

"can they hear i am thinking of them? do they adjust their sock because they sense i was thinking of their color? am i the one coagulating the cells of their heel?") i've not looked for the answer.

a tickle with no source,

when your shirt moves and you are afraid these force the body in on to you, it is sensed. i am aware.

how do you open an open door, as how do i open my open mouth.

the teeth sense each other and press together and outwards, so the nerves of one feel the nerves of the other. is it possible i can sense my teeth's nerves asking to be touched by something other than themselves?

these nerves are not of the teeth. they are of the skin and the tongue and the brain and my tongue is my skin with a different temperament, i chew to alleviate. the nerves are felt elsewhere, physically pulling my weight to my left leg or arm or eye.

maybe if this was distributed it would last a shorter time, but i would wonder where it went, as it helps me understand the shape of my body without having to look.

the sensation, like gas, occupies the space it is in, as the body. i have my skin. and neglect the rest until the stomach gives notice.

beijinhos, groetjes,

